This column is designed to assist authors in becoming familiar with APA format and encourage even the most novice writers to try their hand at composing a manuscript. If there is a specific topic that you would like covered in a future issue, please send an email to katie@ajj.com with your suggestion.

Citing Electronic Sources, Part I: Periodicals

Increasingly, journals, newsletters, reports, and other scholarly publications are moving toward posting articles and information on the Internet. Commonly, authors reference articles from print periodicals that also make their content available online. According to the APA Manual, if an article found on the Web is an exact duplicate of the print version, then an article can be cited as if obtained from the print source, but [Electronic version] should be added after the title. For example:

When there is any indication that an article has been formatted differently for the Web, such as missing page numbers or additional information, then the URL (Web address) and date of retrieval must be listed. For example:

Please note there is no period at the end of the URL.

If you are ever unsure as to whether a document has been altered from the print version, it is always best to include the retrieval information as shown above. Above all, readers need to be able to find the information that you are citing.

Sources

The reference examples above were obtained from the following articles:

Laura Douglas, BA, was an Editorial Assistant, Jannetti Publications, Inc., a Division of Anthony J. Jannetti, Inc., Pitman, NJ, at the time this article was written.